

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION AND SUGGESTION

A. Conclusion

After the data of Moses' dialogue had been analyzed, conclusions were drawn as follow.

1. Types of Speech Function which found in the dialogue was Statement, Question, Offer, and Command. The most dominant type of Speech Function used was in the form of Statement, then followed by Command, Offer, and Question, which were Statement (63.15%), Command (23.70%), Offer (7.90%), and Question (5.25%).
2. Speech Function in the dialogue was coded by mood. Statement coded by declarative, Question coded by interrogative, Offer coded by both declarative and interrogative, and command coded by imperative. It means that Speech Function was congruently coded in mood or there was no metaphorical realization of Speech Function in mood.
3. Speech function coded in the dialogue as the way they were due to informal language used by Moses and the equality in status between Moses and his interlocutors (Khidr, Pharaoh, the Wizard and Banu Israel). Otherwise Moses didn't equalize his status with his God Allah by using formal language but still in form of direct language rather than metaphorical one due to his close relation to his God as His prophet.

B. Suggestion

This study had investigated the types of Speech Function used in the Moses' dialogue, its realization in mood, and how social interaction (tenor) affected the use of speech function. Based on the conclusion stated above, this study had some suggestions as follow.

1. It is suggested to the further researchers who want to make wide exploration on translated language of Al Quran especially English translation to contribute another aspect that affect social interaction.
2. For everyone who reads this thesis, it is suggested to increase, understand and develop broader research not only from the grammar of interpersonal meaning and Speech Function but also from grammar of ideational meaning or textual meaning and also other elements of Speech Function.
3. For the future student of English and Literature Department who wants to conduct the same research, it is suggested to compile more complete materials and analysis, since the researcher feels this thesis is far from perfections.
